IN compliance with numerous requests from all sides for a companion work, in the form of a Japanese Reader, to HOSSFELD'S JAPANESE GRAMMAR and the APPENDIX thereto, I have the satisfaction of offering the present little volume; for, although the Appendix was supplemented by some twenty-three pages of select readings the space then at disposal only permitted of a very limited range of subjects.

In the volume now presented I have had a wider scope and as every writer has some peculiarities of his own, independently of the subjects, recourse has been had to works of a great many authors, so that the book may be thoroughly representative of the best part of Japanese literature, whilst exhibiting to the student at the same time many different styles of composition, and the greatest pains have been taken to exclude, not only every sentence, but even every word that might offend the most fastidious ear.

Special care has been taken, in both Parts, to make the Extracts progressive beginning with easy and gradually proceeding to more difficult pieces, and in the early pages of the book I have given readings so simple in style and construction, that the student who has worked conscientiously through my two preceding works will have little difficulty in translating them with the aid of the Vocabulary and the copious footnotes, which latter have been appended in elucidation of special difficulties occurring in the text and in explanation of all knotty points not fully discussed in the Grammar. In the subsequent readings the student will find, page by page, that he is working deeper and deeper into the language, meeting with new forms of construction, acquiring fresh idioms, and making the acquaintance of a wide circle of native authors. In a word, this JAPANESE READER places in the hands of the beginner, in a very small compass, reading matter which embraces Japanese literature of almost every description.

In this game a board and counters are employed and the principal aim is to prevent one's opponent from extending his counters over the board, which is effected by producing "eyes," i. e. spaces hemmed in by not fewer than four of one's own counters. It must also be noted that "me" signifies both "eye" and "open space." 7 oshō, Buddhist priest. 8 san. See H. J. G. "Honorific Suffixes" p. 158 et seq. 9 ... jōzu nare, lit. 1 beki hazu. Like beki (see footnote p. 13) the noun hazu (lit. necessity) is frequently used to render the idea expressed by our "must" &c.; thus, Sakujiitsu iku hazu de arimashita, (lit. yesterday go necessity was) = he should have gone yesterday. Hazu is often reinforced by a preceding beki; thus, Komban iku beki hazu desu, (lit. tonight go ought necessity is) = he ought to go tonight. In the last sentence iku hazu without beki is equally correct. It should be noted that beki is suffixed to verbs—in the First Conjugation, to the Pres. Indic.; in the Second, to the Indef. Form. The irreg. verbs kuru and suru make ku-beki and su-beki respectively whilst miru makes either mi-beki or miru-beki; thus, su-beki koto, (lit. do-must thing) = a thing which must be done. 2 rampi, prodigalities.

On May 4th, in the year 1743,¹ when Tokio was yet called Yeddo, the festival of Prince Shōtoku² was solemnized at the Shintō temple of Tenjin³ at Yushima, and the worshippers gathered in large numbers on the occasion.

Now there existed in Third Street, Hongō, a sword-dealer's shop known by the name of Fujimura-ya Shimbei,⁴ and a samurai who chanced to pass saw the fine objects exposed for sale. He seemed to be about the age of twenty-two, with a fair complexion, a vivacious eye, and a cue tightly bound denoting a rather hasty temper. He had on a magnificent *haori*⁵ and *hakama*⁶ and wore setta.⁷ In his rear as he stepped out in front, there followed an attendant wearing a blue coat and striped girdle and having on a wooden sword with brass fastenings. The samurai called in at the shop, took a seat, and, looking round at the swords lying there, said, "Mine host! That iron-guarded sword with the dark-coloured hilt yonder,—I do not know whether the braid is black or deep blue,—appears to be a fine one; please let me have a look at it."

1 Kwampō, the era commencing A.D. 1741. 2 Shōtoku Taishi, the great imperial patron of Buddhism in Japan; died A.D. 621. 3 Tenjin the posthumous name by which Sugawara Michizane, the court noble is worshipped as the god or patron saint of letters. 4 The names of shops are denoted by the affix ya (house), thus pan-ya, bakery (from pan, bread), but such words are frequently used to denote also the proprietor. In the present case Fujimura-ya is, strictly speaking the name of the shop, and Shimbei the personal (= Christian) name of the proprietor. 5 haori, a kind of coat worn as half full dress by the middle and upper classes. 6 hakama, wide trousers worn in half full dress. 7 setta, leather-soled sandals.

"Very well, Sir," replied the shop-keeper. [Aside, to the shop-boy:] "Now then! offer the gentleman some teal" [Addressing the samurai again:] "As the crowds have gone to see the festival to-day, the roads are certain to have been dusty and your Honour must have been inconvenienced." Then wiping the dust from the sword, he went on: "Now, kindly look at it, Sir!" and handed it to the samurai, who took it up and examined it remarking:

"It is an extremely fine one. So far as I can judge, I am inclined to believe it to be a Bizen."

"Yes!" answered the shop-keeper, "Your honour is a good judge. I am overwhelmed with admiration. It is exactly as you state. The other dealers are quite sure of its being a production of Sukesada in the sixteenth century. It is regrettable, however, that no maker's name is on it."

"Mine host! What do you ask for it?" enquired the samurai.

"You are very good, Sir," replied the shop-keeper, "I ask no high price, and, as I have just told you, the sword would be extremely valuable, if only it bore the name of the maker. As it is anonymous, however, the price is ten dollars."

"What?" exclaimed the samurai "Ten dollars do you say? That is a little to much. But I expect you will lower to seven and a half, eh?"

"Oh! indeed," affirmed the shop-keeper, "I should be losing at that figure, really I should."

As the samurai and the shop-keeper went on haggling as to the price of the sword, a drunken fellow, who chanced to pass at the back, seized the servant of the samurai, and, shouting, "Hello, what are you about?" reeled, and came to the ground in a sitting position. Then managing to rise again, he scowled at the fellow sideways, shook his fist at him, and commenced to thump him. The servant, imputing the blame to the liquor, received the pommelling quietly, and, without offering any resistance, placed his hands on the ground, and apologized repeatedly, with downcast looks. The drunken man, however refused to listen to his apologies, and only thumped him the harder. The samurai suddenly chanced to look round; and, as the man being ill-treated was his own vassal Tōsuke he was taken by surprise, and apologized to the drunkard, saying:

"I am ignorant as to what rudeness that brute of a servant of mine may have been guilty of committing against Your Honour, but I myself beg your forgiveness for him. Pray pardon him."

"What?" exclaimed the drunkard, "you declare that this fellow is your servant, this outrageously rude creature? If he goes out to be a gentleman's vassal, it would only be becoming in him to keep near to his master in the background! But what does he do? He slouches in the road a good three feet away from the water-tub, and hinders people from passing, and thus caused me to trip up against him. This is the reason for my beating him."

"He is a careless fellow," said the samurai, "and I earnestly beg that your Honour will forgive him. I desire to apologize myself for him."

"Just now," the drunkard went on, "when something crashed against me as I staggered, I thought that possibly it was a dog. But it was this scoundrel, and he caused my knee to strike the ground. Look here! he has made my clothes all muddy. I thrashed him because he was an impertinent fellow. What do you think about that? I intend to do as I please with him. Therefore be kind enough to deliver him into my hands."

¹ Note the very disrespectful mode of addressing the samurai, e.g. the non-employment of honorifics and the insulting pronoun temae, thou. On the other hand the samurai uses polite phraseology, the verb makaru being extremely respectful.

"You see, Sir," answered the samurai, "that he is too foolish to know what he is doing. He is no better than a dog, so kindly excuse him."

"Ha! ha! that's fine!" replied the drunkard. "It's the first time I have heard anything like that. Is it dignified for a samurai to walk out with a dog for a vassal? If he is no better than a dog, I will take charge of him and give him some poison. Beg as you like, I will not accept your apologies. Well, well! If a master wished to apologize for his retainer's impertinence the proper thing for him to do is to place his hands on the ground, and to state his regret repeatedly, apologising and striking the ground with his forehead. But what do you do? Whilst you are apologising you are occupied in loosening your sword with one hand,—nice conduct really for a samurai! What do you mean? Do you intend to kill me, you base scoundrel?"

"Certainly not" said the samurai. "The fact is I thought of buying this sword from the shopkeeper here, and was examining the metalwork, when all at once this trouble arose, and..."

"Oh! whether you buy the thing or not is your business," retorted the drunkard, at which words, seeing that the samurai continued to try to persuade the man to calm his drunken excitement, the spectators joined in, exclaiming:

"Take care! here's a quarrel! mind out!"

"What? a quarrel, you say?"

"Yes; between samurai."

"That's dangerous!"—then, as someone else asked what it was, another replied:

"Well, it seems to be a misunderstanding about buying a sword. That drunken samurai yonder first asked the price, and was just refusing to buy it as it is too dear, when the younger one here arrived on the scene and also asked the price. The drunkard was angry at this and abused him for pricing the sword without reference to him who had been intending to acquire it himself. That's somewhere about how the misunderstanding arose."

But another broke in, exclaiming, "That's not it at all! The fuss is all about a dog. One of them said to the other: 'Since you killed my dog with poison you will have to give me yours, so that I can poison it also'. Arguments about dogs have always occurred; and you know that Shirai Gompachi's case originated in a quarrel about a dog."

"Not at all!" burst out another spectator standing near the one who had just spoken, "that's out of it entirely. It appears that the two samurai are related to one another, one being the uncle, the other the nephew. The drunken fellow with the red face is the uncle, and the handsome young man is the nephew. The quarrel arose from the nephew's refusing to give some pocket-money to his uncle."

Another man, however, standing near, said, "Oh! no, he is a pickpocket."

Upon this, amongst the various opinions given by the spectators, one man's version was that the drunkard was a swashbuckler of a samurai named Kurokawa Kōzō, who lived in the middle residence of Hommyōji at Maruyama, and who formerly had been a vassal of my lord Koide, but who, being bad-mannered, had become addicted to vice, and often used to frighten people by unsheathing his sword, and used to slouch through the streets in a turbulent manner, often forcing his way into restaurants, and then, after he had become satiated with food and drink, instructing the proprietor to come for payment to the middle residence of Hommyōji, in this way ruining people by his violent conduct and vicious propensities, so that the present uproar would probably end in the young samurai getting bullied into paying for drink for him.

"Ah! is that it?" remarked another. "An ordinary man would strike the blackguard to the ground, but I expect that the young samurai is not able to do so,—is he?—he seems weakly."

"Nonsense!" ejaculated another. "He does not know how to handle a sword, that's about it. A samurai who can't handle one is a coward."

These undertoned remarks reached the young samurai's ears upon which he flushed up and became angry, his face turning crimson, and the blue veins standing out on his forehead. Going close up to the drunken wretch, he said:

"Will you not pardon my servant, even though I have offered so many apologies?"

"Talkative fool!" jeered the other. "To look at you, you are a mighty fine person, of whom one would think that he either was a great vassal of the Shōgun, or a member of one of the great clans. But you are a mean, disreputable beggar and nothing could be more barbarous than your conduct. I am less than ever inclined to pardon you; there now, what are you going to do?" and he thereupon spat in the young samurai's face.

This was too much for the patience even of a person so forbearing as the younger man, who replied, "Impertinent fellow that you are! to presume in this manner upon my forbearance, to continue more and more abusive and violent, actually spitting in a gentleman's face! [lit. "You! when I come out from beneath (i.e. am pacifying), you are swollen with conceit;—abuse and violence heaping-up more and more;—as to your spitting saliva in the face of one who is (taru = to aru) a warrior, what an impertinent fellow!"] Since you will not accept apologies, this is what I'll do for you!" With these words, and almost before he could be seen to have put his hand to the hilt of the sword which he had just been examining in the shop, he went out with it and flourished it in the drunkard's face, whereupon the spectators took fright, exclaiming, "Oh! he has drawn his sword," as they observed it flashing in the hand of him whom they had thought, being a weak person, would not draw. Then like leaves in the wind, off they flew pell-mell in all directions. The ward-doors were fastened, in every lane the barriers were shut, and the shop-keepers all closed their shops, so that the whole street was deserted, the old sword-dealer alone continuing to sit heedlessly at his shop-front, merely because he was too bewildered to flee away.

Well, intoxicated as Kurokawa Kōzō might be, he,—on the principle that 'a drunken man acts in accordance with his true character,'—alarmed by the anger apparent in the young samurai's countenance, endeavoured to escape, and had gone about twenty steps with a tottering gait, when his opponent chased him sandal-shod and exclaimed, "Scoundrel! your conduct does not bear out your insulting words. You are a coward, really, for turning your back on a gentleman with whom you are arguing. Come back! come back!"

Kōzō then observing that it was no longer any use, and balancing himself on his tottering legs, placed his hand on his sword-hilt, and was turning round to face the young samurai, when the latter, exclaiming only "Ha!" cut deep into his shoulder, slashing him down so that the drunkard fell on to one knee with a cry, and his antagonist, leaping on him afresh, slashed at his breast in such a manner that he fell sliced slantwise in three pieces. Then dexterously giving him the coup-de-grâce, the young samurai returned to the shop, shaking the blood from his weapon. As he had from the first made up his mind to cut the swashbuckler down, he was not confused in the least, but turned to his vassal, saying:

"Here, Tōsuke, pour some water on this sword from that rain-tub," at which Tōsuke, who had been shaking with fear all the time, exclaimed:

"Ah! Sir, things have come to a nice state! If our master, your father, has his name dragged through the mud through this, it will be awful—and I caused it all. What can I do?"

"Come!" replied the samurai to console him, "do not wail like that. A turbulent fellow who goes through the town upsetting everybody! there is no harm in cutting down a wretch like that. Don't trouble about it." And with these remarks he shouted to the terror-stricken shop-keeper, in an off-hand manner:

"Ha! ha! mine host! I never imagined that this sword of yours would cut like that. It does cut though. It cuts first-class."

The shop-keeper tremblingly made reply: "Nay! it was because Your Honour's arm is skilful."

"No, no!" answered the samurai. "The blade is indeed an excellent one. And how now? I trust you will lower to seven and a half dollars."

So the shop-keeper, desirous to avoid getting mixed-up in the affair, assented.

"And take care," resumed the samurai, "that whatever happens I shall not allow your establishment to be put to any inconvenience on account of what has taken place. Of course I must report at once the affair to the warden of the ward so just allow me the use of your writing-box a moment to write a card."

The shop-keeper, however, not noticing that the writing-box was quite near him, called out in shaky tones: "Boy! bring the writing-box!"—an order which silence only answered to, for all the people in the house had run off no one knew where when the uproar began, and nobody was at hand.

So the samurai said: "Mine host! I indeed admire your bravery,—the bravery appropriate in the proprietor of a sword-shop, sitting here in your shop and not stirring an inch, in spite of this tumult."

"Oh! Sir," stammered the man, "your praise quite confuses me. I have been unable to move through fear right from the commencement, and..."

"Why!" remarked the samurai, "is the writing-box not there by you?"

This remark at last brought the man to his senses, and he pushed the writing-box towards the samurai, who, removing the cover, seized a pen, and quietly signed his name, "Iijima Heitarō," afterwards reporting the affair to the warden of the ward, and went off home to his lord's residence at Ushigome.

1 mashiru, for majiru. 2 All Japanese poetry, with a few exceptions, is written in the Classical Language, its leading characteristics being, (a) lines of five syllables and seven syllables; (b) brevity, a complete poem often containing only three, four, or five lines; (c) absence of rhyme and quantity. Diphthongs, long vowels, and syllables ending in m or n count double because formerly they were pronounced separately and are still so expressed in the Kana writing. 3 isshu no uta, a stanza. 4 shūshin ichi nin fuchi, a life pension

1 The scrupulous adherence to polite phraseology by the women of the educated class should be carefully noted in this extract. In the passage commencing "Injun shugi de wa komarimasu" will be observed a transition from the ordinary style employed in conversation, to that adopted in more formal discourse: enzetsu nari, tōron nari shite. This is usually the case when a speaker formulates an opinion on any subject. 2 samurai, a gentleman belonging to the military caste under the feudal system in Japan. 3 In old Japan it was a common practice to change one's name when an important event occurred. 4 The bank of the aqueduct in Koishikawa, Yedo (now, Tokio). 5 hatamoto, a person of a rank which came next to a daimyō under the feudal system in Japan. Daimyōs, as long as their feudal possessions remained to them, exercised in their own domains the rights of petty rulers, and eighteen of them were to all intents and purposes independent. 6 kōin ni seki-mori nashi "no barrier-keeper to keep time back." Seki-mori, the guard or officers who are stationed at a barrier.

2 As the following passage presents several difficulties we give the free translation as follows: "Now, people may ask me why, among 'so many proverbs, I attach more especially to this one the epithet 'of 'word of gold.' I will give you the reason although, being 'mystical, you may not understand it. Know then, in the first place, 'that Koppi Dōjin, though now an honourable citizen of the good 'city of Tokio, is nevertheless, by birth nothing else but a clod-hopper. Well, some twenty years ago, this clod-hopper of a Koppi Dōjin was but a small half-starved wretch, shouting with all the 'force of his lungs: 'The Great Study. Preface by Tchoū-hi... 'Doctor Tching-tsew has said, &c.' or else 'It is not the height 'of the hill 'which gives it its value, but the trees which clothe 'it,' and other phrases of that sort. It was still the time when the 'nobles caused to be carried before them their lacquered boxes 'bearing gilded coats-of-arms. . . Then the guards cried: 'Down! 'down! I tell you! If you do not obey I will smite off your heads,' 'and other menaces of the same sort. At this description you all 'recognize the times when the Tokugawas had the power—but I am 'straying, let us return to our subject."

AN INCIDENT IN PARLIAMENT.²

On March 3rd 1897 Mr. Komuro Shigehiro presented a formal "question" requesting the Cabinet to state whether it intended to act in accordance with the promise which had been made, i.e. of governing constitutionally in conformity with the popular desire. This promise, (he stated) had been violated and amongst other malpractices it was a matter of public notoriety that members of Parliament had been bought up.

[At the termination of Mr. Komuro's speech Mr. Kudō Kōkan ascended the rostrum and addressed the House thus:]

"Watakushi wa Komuro Kun³ no enzetsu ni tsuite,—

J. G. p. 14 and App. H. J. G. p. 79.) In the present instance, however, mono appears with the signification of koto. 3 ga. Here, before the transitive verb fusuru one would have expected wo. The speaker possibly had intended a different conclusion to the sentence than that he framed above. Sunawachi may be regarded as a mild "for this reason." 4 mono has here its more common signification and denotes "persons."

1 Ina! nay. This is a term from the Classical language and is often employed emphatically by modern authors, in imitation of English idiom. 2 ma ni wa = tama ni wa or naka ni wa, "among the others." Ma formerly signified "room," "space." 3 This repetition of the accusative after the verb for emphasis, is frequent, especially among the lower classes. 4 Otto! This is an interjection which may be rendered by "excuse me." 5 icayuru, what is called. An exceptional verbal form derived from iu, to say, like arayuru from aru. 6 Kin-ju . . . tōkarazu. A quotation from the Classical language; tōkarazu = tōku nai.
